Pace University, a private comprehensive university with campuses in Westchester County and New York City invites applications for a tenure-track position in Educational Technology Specialist for the Fall semester of 2005.

The successful candidate will teach in and administer a masters-level Educational Technology Specialist program. The program is a joint program between the schools of Education and Computer Science and Information Systems.

Applicants should have background, experience and general expertise in the applications of technology in school settings; an earned doctorate in either Educational Technology or a Computer-related discipline [perhaps Ph.D./or Ed.D in one and MS in the other, or equivalent experience in the cognate field]; experience and expertise using technology in P-12 school settings (preferably urban); evidence of teaching excellence; demonstrated record of, or potential for, scholarship and a demonstrated interest in research and an ability to negotiate multiple contexts.

We seek individuals who are reflective, who integrate theory and practice and who seek a strong community of teacher/scholars.

Pace University is an Equal Employment and Affirmative Action Employer, committed to ensuring a diverse learning and working environment. Consistent with our commitment to a diverse faculty and staff to serve our diverse student population, candidates of color and individuals from other traditionally under-represented groups are strongly encouraged to apply.
